Preface

Immigration and asylum policy have become the object of intense political disputes in many Member States and at supranational level. Their legal dimension is increasingly influenced by EU directives and regulations on various aspects of entry, border controls, visas, immigration and asylum – as the policy crisis of 2015/16 demonstrated exemplarily. Legal and political debates at the national and supranational level often revolve around the contents of EU legislation which determines the outcome of court cases throughout the continent and guides national parliaments when adopting domestic rules. After more than 20 years of legislative activities at EU level and more than 200 judgments of the Court of Justice in Luxembourg, it has become difficult to keep an oversight of the diverse instruments adopted on a variety of topics ranging from visa applications in consulates abroad and border controls at sea over the entry and stay of family members, students or intra-corporate transferees to reception conditions and procedural guarantees for asylum seekers. This Commentary pursues the objective of assisting readers to confront the complexity of supranational legislation.

The publication of a new directive or regulation in the Official Journal is the beginning of an occasionally cumbersome process of implementation, enforcement and adjudication at the national and supranational level. This Commentary aims to support those involved in different functions and at various levels in interpreting and applying supranational rules: judges at domestic courts, officials working for administrative authorities or national ministries, members of civil society, academics, practicing lawyers or civil servants with an EU institution. To support all these potential readers required the authors to pay attention to both the seemingly technical detail and the grand scheme connecting different instruments. Four thematic introductions, written by the lead editor, are meant to allow newcomers to keep an oversight of a highly complex area of the law, thus recognising the proverbial forest behind the trees. Detailed comments on no less than 20 different instruments provide an in-depth analysis of the most important pieces of legislation written by eminent experts from both academia and legal practice from across Europe.

In order to provide a comprehensive overview, this book employs the method of a ‘commentary’ in the German tradition explaining the contents and legal context of each legislative instrument article by article. Thus, the chapter on a specific directive or regulation will not usually be read from A to Z like a book. Rather, readers will consult the information on a specific article and will then be re-directed, by means of cross-references, to related information elsewhere in the Commentary. By way of example, someone interested in the scope and interpretation of the public policy exception in Article 6 Long-Term Residents Directive 2003/109/EC will open the relevant pages on this article and look for the information she requires. Reading the more specific comments, she will be directed to horizontal information on the interpretation of the public policy standard in the introductory chapter on the legal framework for EU immigration policy. They explain how the ECJ case law on different instruments feeds into a more or less consistent whole. However, not all provisions have been subject to court rulings at the national or supranational level. In such cases, the authors of the chapter may present legal argument how the provision should be interpreted in light of the interpretative standards described in the general introduction explaining the constitutional framework.

Preface

We have been careful to bring together a rich collection of authors with various backgrounds from across Europe. Some are experienced practitioners with a high expertise in the field they are writing on. Others are senior academics or promising young researchers involved in debates about immigration and asylum. Not all authors contributing to this book will necessarily share the same opinions on specific topics. Therefore, different views cannot be excluded; they are the hallmark of legal debates on controversial topics. We are united by the ambition to provide our readers with reliable and in-depth materials on a complex area.

It is a characteristic of immigration and asylum law that its interpretation is the object of legal and political disputes and disagreements. For that reason, reliability is a core feature of this Commentary. Each chapter provides a trustworthy overview of the state of the art, including court judgments. Whenever there is room for disagreement, existing opinions in the literature shall be presented, possibly together with a proposal by the author how the question should be resolved. In doing so, the contributors participate in the doctrinal reconstruction of the law in line with the continental tradition of interpretative hermeneutics in areas where no case law exists so far.

As a transnational undertaking, it is not the purpose of this Commentary to inform our readers how the Member States implement European rules. Rather, it has the objective of describing the contents of EU legislation, of identifying open questions of interpretation and of providing arguments what a potential answer might be. Given that the EU is a multilingual polity, we have invited authors to include case law by national courts from across Europe and academic writing in different languages.

The third edition was delayed as a result of the ongoing reform of asylum policy, which the Commission had kickstarted with several legislative initiatives during 2016. For many years, we had assumed – and hoped – that the EU institutions would agree on a compromise that would help overcome the structural deficits of supranational asylum policy. That did not happen. Similarly, the ‘Pact on Migration and Asylum’, presented by the Commission in September 2021, seems not to have reversed the political stalemate. At the time of writing, discussions within the Council were ongoing at a technical level and the European Parliament was preparing to adopt its position; it remained uncertain whether the package would ever be adopted. Even if that happened, we may expect the contents of the final legislation to differ markedly from the Commission’s proposals in important respects as a result of inter-institutional compromises. We have decided, therefore, to publish the third edition on the basis of secondary legislation as it stood during the spring of 2021. At the same time, failure of policy reform reinvigorates the idea behind the Commentary: to analyse highly complex legislation that raises formidable questions of interpretation when being applied to scenarios the legislature did not necessarily have in mind.

We hope that the common methodological concept underlying a Commentary article-by-article will be useful for both practitioners and academics working on domestic or supranational immigration and asylum law. Of course, there may be gaps and omissions. The editors and authors therefore appreciate any suggestion how to improve the general scheme or individual chapters in subsequent editions of this book. ## Acknowledgments

The editors express their gratitude to the researchers and assistants of the University Chair of European and International Law and the Research Centre Immigration & Asylum Law at the University of Konstanz. Professor Kay Hailbronner, who held the university chair until 2010, initiated the idea of the Commentary whose first edition was published in 2010. It has been managed by his successor Professor Daniel Thym ever since the second edition, published in 2016. The editors owe great debt to Sabine Gerber who did an excellent coordination work for the first edition. The second edition saw substantial changes that have been diligently administered by Carolin Beverungen Arévalo, Sigrid Gies and Dr. Tobias Klarmann. Marie-Louise Reuter deserves much appreciation for the skilful, trustworthy and cooperative way in which she managed the manuscripts submitted by the authors for the third edition. This time-consuming project could not have been completed without the invaluable help provided by the student assistants of the university chair. For the third edition they include: Jule Arwinski; Johanna Bottyanfy; Iris Imgrund; and Anna Schilling. All the people mentioned above did a wonderful job in preparing the word files for the commentary and in checking compliance with the style guide. Our contact persons with the publisher, Thomas Klich and Dr. Wilhelm Warth, deserve credit for their reliable and flexible cooperation.
